

out of the process and, on the other hand, I feel if the state is going to become part of the partnership it must participate financially and actively in the program.

Q. Governor, you mentioned the word economies. Do you have any specific examples of what you had in mind?

A. Yes, we have quite a few specifics in mind, and that is exactly what Mr. Lauber's Task Force on Modern Management is engaged in right now. We have questionnaires around at the various State agencies attempting to calibrate and to find the purposes of various departments and sub-departments to see if there are more economical and efficient ways to provide the services, to make sure that duplications will be removed, and above all to streamline and make more efficient the provision of services to the public.

Q. Governor, have you thought of possibly giving Mr. Lively a job?

A. I haven't thought of offering Mr. Lively a job, no. I don't think in terms of individuals to the extent that I would single out one candidate for a particular provision of work or anything of that sort. I think Mr. Lively ran a creditable race, and I think that the vote he got is indicative of the fact that his candidacy did attract a considerable amount of attention. And while I'm on the subject of politics in Baltimore City, I want to say that I'm very concerned about the maintenance and preservation of the two-party system in Baltimore. While I don't think it's primarily a governor's chore to enter the restoration of political well being of his party in a municipality, I feel that the situation is so bad in the City at the moment that I almost have to become personally active in attempting to restore two-party government to this City. I intend to meet with Republican leaders in the near future to discuss the Republican party in Baltimore City, and I intend to do everything I can to see that the Republican party becomes an effective ingredient in an election. I think that this can best be done by interesting more young people in the party, and I think much needs to be done in this respect.

Q. Are there a large contingent of Republican leaders in the State?

A. Yes, there are.

Q. Do you know whom you will meet with?

A. I haven't really made a decision about the people I'll meet with, certainly the people on the Central Committee and other key people in municipal offices, people around the State who have an interest in the party and many people of Republican persuasion who are just
