And from the clerks, sheriffs and naval officers, for fines, forfeitures, licences, naval duties, &c. the sum of £.6950 5 6, subject to a deduction of at least one third for insolvencies, and remissions of fines and forfeitures.

The agent suggests an opinion, that little or none of the uninstalled debt for confiscated property will be received during the year 1797, the greater part of the debtors of this description having filed bills in chancery to be either released from their contracts, or have abatements made on the amount of their purchases; many of them have been filed eight or ten years, and no prospect of being brought to an issue in any short period of time, owing; (as the attorney-general informs him,) to the want of some person to attend on behalf of the state the surveys and locations of the lands for which those debts were contracted. And of the balances due for taxes, a very small amount can ever be received, the collectors and their securities being insolvent; nor can the agent with any degree of precision say what part of the installed debt will be received during the year 1797, a considerable part thereof being subject to such delay as the common course of law admits of.

The agent begs leave to observe, that there yet remains confiscated property unsold, the title of which he has been engaged in ascertaining, and which will be ready for sale in the year 1797, to the probable amount of £.5000; and that there is information lodged by sundry citizens of property to a very considerable amount as liable to confiscation, without their furnishing the agent with any title papers, the want of which has prevented him from laying the state's claim thereto before the attorney-general for his opinion. The agent therefore begs leave to suggest to your honours the propriety of passing a law or resolution, limiting such persons to some definite period for producing the title papers of such property as they may have heretofore discovered, or be for ever thereafter excluded from any advantage of such discovery.

All which is submitted.

WILLIAM MARBURY, Agent.
