

Carolina, 5,929—and some of the remaining states, not one thousand men. The total number in actual service during the war, officially reported; from Virginia, 71,254; New York, 58,367; Maryland, 42,636; Tennessee, 22,062; Pennsylvania, 21,926—and the remaining states not so numerous. From this, it appears, that the state of Maryland furnished considerably more men, according to her population, than any other state in the Union.

The patriotism of the state was not evinced alone by the number of men furnished in actual service, during the war. The funds of the state were appropriated from time to time, to sustain expenses which the national treasury could then illy meet. The actual capital of the state was impaired by those advances to an extent, which it has not yet recovered. The call of government for loans were met with greater promptitude, and to greater amounts by the citizens of Maryland, than by those of any other state in the Union in proportion to their capital.

The number of private armed vessels fitted out from this state, to annoy the shipping of the enemy, was probably greater, than from any other state. It might be considered invidious to assert, that they were more dreaded by the enemy, and that they done more damage to their commerce, than those from any other state of the Union; but certain it is, that the "Baltimore clippers." became proverbial for activity, gallantry and success.
