

...the fact that the British Government had been forced to accept the terms of the 1800 Act, and that the Irish people had been subjected to a long and painful process of union, was a source of deep resentment and a constant reminder of the powerlessness of the Irish people in the face of British imperialism.

...the fact that the British Government had been forced to accept the terms of the 1800 Act, and that the Irish people had been subjected to a long and painful process of union, was a source of deep resentment and a constant reminder of the powerlessness of the Irish people in the face of British imperialism.

...the fact that the British Government had been forced to accept the terms of the 1800 Act, and that the Irish people had been subjected to a long and painful process of union, was a source of deep resentment and a constant reminder of the powerlessness of the Irish people in the face of British imperialism.

...the fact that the British Government had been forced to accept the terms of the 1800 Act, and that the Irish people had been subjected to a long and painful process of union, was a source of deep resentment and a constant reminder of the powerlessness of the Irish people in the face of British imperialism.

...the fact that the British Government had been forced to accept the terms of the 1800 Act, and that the Irish people had been subjected to a long and painful process of union, was a source of deep resentment and a constant reminder of the powerlessness of the Irish people in the face of British imperialism.

...the fact that the British Government had been forced to accept the terms of the 1800 Act, and that the Irish people had been subjected to a long and painful process of union, was a source of deep resentment and a constant reminder of the powerlessness of the Irish people in the face of British imperialism.

...the fact that the British Government had been forced to accept the terms of the 1800 Act, and that the Irish people had been subjected to a long and painful process of union, was a source of deep resentment and a constant reminder of the powerlessness of the Irish people in the face of British imperialism.

...the fact that the British Government had been forced to accept the terms of the 1800 Act, and that the Irish people had been subjected to a long and painful process of union, was a source of deep resentment and a constant reminder of the powerlessness of the Irish people in the face of British imperialism.

...the fact that the British Government had been forced to accept the terms of the 1800 Act, and that the Irish people had been subjected to a long and painful process of union, was a source of deep resentment and a constant reminder of the powerlessness of the Irish people in the face of British imperialism.