PREFACE

Grateful acknowledgment is here made to all those who have been helpful in the compilation of this work. To all the libraries mentioned in the Key to the location of the imprints, I am indebted for their cooperation and service.

INTRODUCTION

The purpose of this dissertation is to present a survey of printing in Maryland for the period 1823 to 1826 inclusive. It is part of a research project of the "American Imprints Inventory" to compile a complete national bibliography.

The American Imprints Inventory has accumulated much of the material which has been produced by the presses of the nation. From this wealth of material, the check-list in these pages has been drawn.

This check-list of Maryland Imprints contains all the titles and locations found in the National Union Catalog of the Library of Congress, the card catalogs of the Maryland Historical Society, the Enoch Pratt Free Library, and titles that had to be located in other libraries throughout the country.

Chapter I, Historical Background of the Period, is a sketch of the social and political situation which existed in Maryland during the period 1823 to 1826. It traces the important events which influenced the printing and publishing of these years. In Chapter II, an account of the lives and work of the more prominent printers and publishers of this period will be given.

The imprints are arranged chronologically with the entries set up by author and title. The Library of Congress rules will be followed for entry and capitalization form. Notations, in symbol form, of the libraries and sources in which these imprints may be located, will be found under the imprints.

The key to the location of these libraries will precede the imprints. The manual in which this key is contained is Symbols Used in the Union Catalog of the Library of Congress, Fourth edition, 1942.

CHAPTER I.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND OF THE PERIOD

The period of Maryland history from 1823 to 1826 is characterized chiefly by the efforts of the state to complete its return to normal conditions after the War of 1812. Any reconstruction period is necessarily one of disorganization and turmoil, and so were the years of recovery from the War in Maryland. However, by the year 1823, with the effects of the War largely obliterated, Maryland was able to turn her attention to constructive activities within her own borders.

Maryland, and the city of Baltimore in particular, had suffered materially during and after the War. She had been temporarily crippled and disheartened in the race of prosperity, but not destroyed; for her natural resources could not be taken away, and the people who had improved them in earlier days were still on hand to engage in new operations. The men of enterprise and talent were still there, and though not so young and hopeful, were nevertheless not without zeal and enterprise, tempered by experience. They saw that a change had come over American trade, not only with the cessation of the war at home and in Europe, but that great material improvements in transportation, steam, and the rivalries of successful trade, were operating in the minds of younger men of equal intelligence, in other sections of the nation; but that, when success creates rivals, peace not only affords but stimulates the means for successful rivalry. They saw that labor, patience, and capital were to take the place of that rapid, daring kind of war commerce that had so magically assisted the fortunes of America for twenty or thirty years. They saw that enterprise, to be repaid, must be content with slower processes, and that the clipper of the bay was no longer the Aladdin of the counting-house. With this patience at heart, an auspicious change took place in the commercial affairs of the state between 1820 and 1825. The extensive establishments and ventures became more limited, but were more significant in both foreign and domestic trade. The shipments of 1823 show that Maryland had no crushing rivalry to contend with in the trade that circumstances had so greatly altered.¹

The people of Maryland, or their chosen representatives, from the period of the American Revolution, had evinced a disposition to lend aid to every undertaking which aimed to encourage and promote the internal resources of the state. This spirit of modern development spread rapidly over the entire Union; and President Monroe, in his message to Congress in 1824, directed attention to the improvement of internal resources as a matter of national concern. At this period, interstate roads and canals were the chief subject of discussion. State legislatures and the Federal Congress were flooded with projects for development and improvement. In Congress, the Cumberland Road and the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal were among the principal objects discussed; but the general design embraced regular systems of communication, principally from east to west. John C. Calhoun, in arguing the expansion case for Baltimore and Maryland in Congress in 1817, said:

What can add more to the wealth, strength, and political prosperity of our country than cheapness of transportation? It gives to the interior the advantages of the seaboard. It makes the country prices, whether in the sale of raw products or in the purchase of articles to be consumed, come near to the price of the commercial town, and it benefits the seaboard by enlarging the sphere of demand. Were the pecuniary gains of the farmer or merchant the only consideration, it might well be doubted whether a system of good roads and canals should not be left to individual enterprise. But there are far higher motives. The strength and political prosperity of the republic are concerned with it.

The industrial leaders of Maryland determined to avail themselves of their natural geographical position to secure possession of a fair share of the internal trade of the country; and the statements issued under the auspices of business interests during the first half of the nineteenth century offer a striking analogy to the reports of modern chambers of commerce when broaching special plans for the development of communities and states. In the matter of internal improvements looking toward the expansion of inland trade, the project that especially concerned the people of Maryland during these years was the Chesapeake and Ohio canal.² Although the work on the canal did not actually begin until after 1826, legislation and reports concerning it appear among the imprints for the years 1823-1826, so the importance of the ground-work accomplished during this period must not be under-estimated.

Much money and effort through many years had already been spent upon the original plan to make the Potomac navigable.³ The immense mineral resources of western Maryland, the rich mines of iron ore, and the inexhaustible supply of coal which its mountains contained, made it a matter of particular importance to Maryland that the designs of the Potomac Company be completed, irrespective of the growing trade of the West. A water communication into the heart of the mineral region, affording the cheapest means of transportation of such heavy articles, was almost necessary to develop fully its immense wealth, and pour it into the markets of the Atlantic.⁴ When it was at last determined that the project was not feasible, the Board of Public Works of Virginia, pursuant to a resolution of the legislature of that state adopted early in 1820, appointed Thomas Moore their chief engineer, to examine the waters of the Potomac, above the upper line of the District of Columbia, and to explore the country between the Potomac and the Ohio on the one side, and the Potomac and the Sappahannock on the other, with a view to ascertain and report upon the practicability of a communication by canal between the three rivers.

Soon after, a specially appointed commission from Virginia and Maryland

entered a report that the old Potomac Company had failed to comply with its charter; that having extended its capital stock and the tolls received, the Company had incurred a heavy debt that it was unable to discharge; that it would be inexpedient to give further aid to the Company; and that the only thing to be done was to cancel its charter and adopt some more effectual means of rendering the river useful. After reviewing the different kinds of improved inland navigation, the commission expressed the opinion that the proposed canal would make Cumberland a center for the Western trade; and that it would also insure to the citizens of Baltimore, with their capital and enterprise, a larger share of the advantages that would result from it. But the people of Baltimore were not convinced of the advantages accruing to that city in having the eastern terminal of the canal at Georgetown, as proposed. In fact, the majority of the Baltimore merchants were persuaded that the canal would detract from, rather than add to the prosperity of the chief city. The county members of the General Assembly had shown a majority willing to support the project as conceived by its promoters; but the strenuous objections of the city helped to defeat the bill to incorporate, in place of the old Potomac Company, a new joint stock company, entitled the Potomac Canal Company, of which the capital stock should be $1,500,000, subscribed equally by Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia.

It should be borne in mind that by the advantage of her position, as well as by reason of the exceptional enterprise of her citizens, the rapidly growing city of Baltimore enjoyed by far the greater part of the trade of the bay, in addition to the trade with the prosperous counties of Frederick and Washington on the west, and those counties of Maryland and Pennsylvania along the course of the Susquehanna.⁵ Rival meetings advancing rival plans for trade with the West were promoted. Advocates of the Potomac-Ohio Canal held meetings in Virginia, Maryland, and the District, formed committees, and called a convention in Washington. Their programme was constantly expanding, and the rosy prospect of extending the proposed canal to Lake Erie was held up before the eyes of the delegates.

Because, however, the bill submitted to the General Assembly by the canal commissioners failed to provide explicitly for the connection of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal with the city of Baltimore, and because of the opposition made by the Baltimore merchants, the Maryland Assembly refused to sanction the project. Later, the charter passed the Virginia legislature, but only after it had been amended, at the insistence of the friends of the measure, so as to remove the objections raised by Baltimore, whereupon the Maryland legislature approved the project. The Act was ratified by Congress in March, 1825, and on the 9th of February, 1826, by Pennsylvania. The old Potomac Company accepted the terms proposed to them by Virginia, Maryland, and the District of Columbia, and surrendered its charters to the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company. By the amended charter, the new company was to construct a navigable canal of not less than forty feet at the surface, twenty-eight feet at the bottom, and not less than four feet deep, from the tide water of the Potomac in the District of Columbia, to Cumberland, or the mouth of Savage Creek, thence across the Alleghany Mountains to some convenient point of navigation on the waters of the Ohio or its tributary streams. On July 4th, 1828, the enterprise was formally commenced by John Quincy Adams, President of the United States, who dug the first spadeful of earth from the site marked out for the channel of the canal.⁶

Another project which occupied the attention of Maryland citizens was the establishment, in 1825, of the state primary school system. It consisted of a superintendent of public instruction to be appointed by the governor, while the levy courts of the respective counties annually selected nine commissioners of public schools, together with a number of other persons, not exceeding eighteen, to be inspectors. The commissioners were empowered to regulate, alter, or lay off the school districts; to receive the money apportioned to the county, and divide it among the districts; to hold property as a body corporate for the use of the primary schools, and, with the inspectors, to examine and qualify all applicants for the office of teacher. The taxable inhabitants were directed to assemble in their respective districts to choose a district clerk, and to elect three trustees, who were to build and repair school houses, employ duly qualified teachers, and pay their salaries out of the money placed in their hands by the commissioners. They were required to report semi-annually to the commissioners, who in turn reported annually to the county clerk the condition of the schools. It was made the duty of the inspectors to visit the several schools quarterly at least, and examine into the proficiency of the scholars and the good order and regularity of the schools. The powers exercised by the levy courts of the counties were vested in the mayor and city council of Baltimore, for the regulation of the primary schools of the city. Finally, the law erecting this extensive system was to be submitted to the people, and was to be in force only in those counties where a majority of votes was cast in its favor in the ensuing election. The revenues assigned for this purpose were to be divided among the counties and the city of Baltimore in proportion to the white population.⁷

It is interesting to note that more printing and publishing was done in the city of Baltimore during the period 1823-1826 than in all the other towns and cities of the state combined. Not in this field alone did Baltimore make its influence felt in the state; it dominated politics and government, religious life, commercial enterprise - in fact, all fields of endeavor. Unfortunately, its influence was not always for the better. During the first half of the nineteenth century, "the Baltimore mob" constituted a real menace to the welfare of the state; so much so, that the weight of the argument against home rule for the city seemed to rest on the side of the counties. Baltimore was not, however, peculiar in that respect; practically all large American cities have, at one time or another, passed through political periods during which the vicious elements chose any party label that seemed most available or convenient to carry out the plans of forensic demagogues controlled by back-room bosses. On the otherhand, having in earlier times fewer temptations and more men of leisure actuated by a genuine desire to promote the public welfare, the country districts maintained a moral ascendancy over the cities.⁸ As long as these rural districts were not organized for political ends under specious pretenses of service or militant morality, dishonest office seekers had little ground upon which to work against candidates who were favorable and intimately known in their respective communities.⁹

The battle to erase political and religious discrimination of any kind was being waged in behalf of the Jews during these years. Until the year 1826 no Jew could hold any office, civil or military, under the state government. This racial and religious exclusion, however, had not been characteristic of the founders of Maryland. It first developed during the Puritan regime, and was revamped, with modifications, after the close of proprietary control. After the Revolution, and prior to 1826, there had been many attempts to give equality of suffrage to the Jews, most of whom lived in Baltimore; but all efforts had invariably met with strong opposition, particularly from the county delegates, who, quite over and above "religious reasons," opposed any measure that would give Baltimore Town more extended participation in state affairs. Subsequent to the American Revolution, or, more specifically, in 1797, Solomon Stting began a thirty year struggle to amend or abolish the law that required of all office seekers a declaration of belief in the Christian religion. This effort was inspired by his father-in-law, Bernard Gratz, lately come down from Philadelphia, where the Gratz family had played a worthy role from early colonial times.

The "memorial" which was then drawn up petitioned the assembly to extend to the Jews equal privileges before law with other citizens. This was followed by a like petition on November 26, 1802, from "a sect of people called Jews" whose grievance was that "they are deprived of holding any position of profit or trust under the constitution and laws of this state." These and like petitions were preferred in 1803 and 1804. At first they were shelved; but finally, a vote being insisted upon, the proposed amendment was defeated by a decisive vote, and no further efforts were made to free the Jews of these civil disabilities until 1816.

In 1818 Thomas Kennedy, of Washington County, took up the problem; and his labors did not cease until the measures which he advocated had been incorporated in the laws of Maryland. In his public addresses Kennedy stated that the first of these later measures on behalf of the Jews had been drawn up and offered by William Pinkney. In any event, the measure soon became known as the "Jew Bill."¹⁰ As such, it was made a distinct issue in the state politics, arousing much bitter feeling; for, as intimated above, political leaders were not wanting who stirred up racial and religious prejudice for personal advantage.

The debate of the session of 1819-1820 was preserved in notes kept by Kennedy, whose stand in the matter caused his defeat in 1821 and 1823. Kennedy, however, had the able assistance of H. H. Brackenbridge of Baltimore City, John V. L. McMahon, General William B. Winder, and others. In his argument for the extension of civil rights, Kennedy was supported not merely by the letter of the state Declaration of Rights, but by Article VI of the Federal Constitution, and by the then recently adopted First Amendment. He also had behind him an insistent public opinion which took cognizance both of the importance and influence of certain Jews in Baltimore and of the actual hardships upon them arising out of their civil disabilities. Thus, in the debates of 1823-24, a delegate refers to the disability of a young Jew, (Benjamin I. Cohen), who, having been elected by his brother officers captain of the Marion Rifle Corps, was unable to qualify as such under his commission received from Governor Stevens because he could not conscientiously take the oath of fidelity as a Christian; and the Company determined to remain without a captain until Cohen's disability was removed. The subject was brought before the Assembly at each succeeding session. In 1822 it passed; but before it could become law it was necessary for it to be approved by a subsequent legislature, and the Assembly of 1823 failed to confirm the bill. Finally, on the last day of the session of 1824-25, the bill was duly ratified.¹¹

The Negroes lost one of the most active champions of their cause when Elisha Tyson died on the 16th of February, 1824. He had been instrumental in organizing the first anti-slavery society in Maryland in 1793, and had devoted much of his life to the abolition movement. As a tribute to his endeavors in their behalf, over 3,000 Negroes attended his remains to the grave.¹²

Now that we have described some of the more significant political and social trends which form the basis for Maryland's history during the years 1823-1826, we are prepared to understand better the background against which the printing and publishing of the period were done. In Chapter II, therefore, we shall present brief sketches of the lives and contributions to American publishing of some of the prominent printers and publishers of the time.

CHAPTER II

PROMINENT PRINTERS AND PUBLISHERS

Hezekiah Niles

Hezekiah Niles was born at Jeffries Ford, East Bradford County, Chester, Pennsylvania, on October 10, 1777. He spent his printing apprenticeship with Benjamin Johnson, a printer in Philadelphia. In 1797 he set up his own printing establishment in Wilmington, Delaware, and from there, he came to Baltimore in 1797, with his partner, Vincent Bonsal. He deserves to be mentioned for his outstanding contribution to American journalism, Miles' Weekly Register, begun in 1811, and conducted by its founder until 1836.¹ Although not a daily or even a semi-weekly, it is considered the most important newspaper of its era. In its pages the political and economic news of the country was reported with a fairness and fidelity which characterize no other paper of the time. It achieved a national circulation, and was extensively quoted by other papers. In fact, it was a sort of general distributor of news for its contemporaries. So accurate was it that it has been quoted by historians and other writers upon American history more than any other single newspaper in the history of this country. In 1836 when Hezekiah Niles relinquished editorship, it was continued by his son, William Ogden Niles, who had attempted to establish The Journal at Albany, New York, in 1825, but who, upon the failure of that sheet, became associated with his father on The Register in 1827. The younger Niles conducted the paper until June 27, 1849. Its motto was, "The Past - The Present - for the Future." The Register was discontinued because the newspapers of the country more and more performed the same service for their readers.²

Benjamin Lundy

Benjamin Lundy was a heroic figure. His Genius of Universal Emancipation was one of the most important periodicals devoted to the abolition-antislavery cause. He began the Genius in 1821 in Mt. Pleasant, Ohio, without capital and with only six subscribers. Each month he would walk twenty miles to Steubenville to get his paper printed, and returned with the edition on his back. Later he walked to Baltimore, made his paper a weekly and published it there, but a local slave-dealer assaulted and almost killed him. Recovering, he walked thousands of miles throughout the country preaching abolition and colonization, and continuing his paper. He journeyed up to Vermont to invite young William Lloyd Garrison to become his assistant, but Garrison parted with Landy after a few years on the issue of gradual as opposed to immediate abolition.³

Jonas Green

Jonas Green was the last in a long line of printers, his family having been in the trade for over 150 years. Lawrence G. Wroth, in A History of Printing in Colonial Maryland, has covered the history of this remarkable family so well that we shall make only a few remarks here.

The Green family had been printing in Annapolis since 1738, when Jonas' great grandfather, Samuel Green, started the press there. Jonas Green took over the family printing establishment in 1811, and from this time until 1839 he did a very effective job, printing the laws of the state and the Maryland Gazette. When Green died, the center of the printing trade shifted from Annapolis to the younger city of Baltimore.⁴

Johann Gruber

Since Hagerstown, Maryland, was settled largely by German immigrants, it is to be expected that German printing was done there on a large scale. Among the German printers of this period, Johann Gruber, the first German printer in Hagerstown, is prominent. Born in October, 1778, he gradually came to prefer the printing trade to the career in medicine which his father wanted him to pursue.

He is notable for the publication of the second Almanac in the United States, The Hagerstown Town and Country Almanac, and Der Neue Nord-Amerikanische Stadt und Land Calender, both of which lasted for well over a century. Several imprints for each of these publications appear in this survey. Gruber was in business alone until 1811, when he made his son-in-law, Daniel May, his partner. In December, 1857, Gruber died at the age of eighty-five.

The publishing of German books in general brought only meagre financial returns, barely sufficient to make ends meet. Most publishers in this field drew their main sources of income from job printing in both English and German.⁵

One would expect that Baltimore, being the seat of the government of the Catholic Church in the United States, would be a center for Catholic printing also. However, until Dornin, in 1809, and Fielding Lucas, Jr., in 1816, this was not the case.⁶ During the years 1823-1826, there was a noticeable increase in Catholic publishing, largely through the efforts of Mr. Lucas and Joseph Robinson.

Joseph Robinson

The J. Robinson, whose name appears as a printer of many Catholic books from 1810-1830, and later, does not seem to have been a Catholic. Born in Frederick in 1787, he had a circulating library in 1810, and conducted Robinson's Magazine in 1818. He was a grand master of the Masons, and a general in the War of 1812.⁷

James Myres

James Myres, whose imprint bears the added information, "near the Cathedral," was sexton of the Cathedral, and the Baltimore Directory of 1827 lists his dwelling as in the rear of that church. He ran a bookstore in connection with it, and several books, printed by others, bear his imprint. He published the Catholic Directory for a while.⁸

Fielding Lucas, Jr.

Fielding Lucas, Jr., as he always signed himself, was the greatest of the Baltimore Catholic publishers. Born in Fredericksburg, Virginia, on September 3, 1781, he first entered business in 1805 in Philadelphia, and then in Baltimore formed the firm of Conrad, Lucas, and Co., of which he shortly became the sole proprietor. He was an Episcopalian, but married Elizabeth Carrall, a Catholic, and for many years attended Mass at the Cathedral, where he was even a pew-holder. He died in March, 1854. On his death-bed he was received into the Church, and was buried from the Cathedral. It is related that he considered himself a Catholic for many years.⁹

He was a man of great public spirit, and was connected with many civic and individual enterprises. In 1810 his name is mentioned among those who planned the Washington Monument. During the War of 1812 he served as a private with the 27th Baltimore Infantry, and later he was a member of the committee that erected the Battle Monument. In 1838 Lucas became president of the City Council, and a director of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. He also aided in the formation of the Maryland Historical Society.¹⁰

His works, unfortunately, present a prime bibliographical puzzle, for very many of them, after 1820, contain no date of publication, and the records of the firm were all destroyed in the Great Fire of 1906.¹¹

Thus we conclude our brief survey of Maryland printing, and proceed to an examination of the actual material produced by the Maryland presses during the years 1823-1826.

CONCLUSION

In compiling this work, much time and effort were expended. Verification of the titles contained herein was made either by examining the books themselves, or by correspondence. Although there are four hundred and ninety-nine titles listed, there is still the possibility that other imprints will one day be located. Therefore, this work can by no means be considered as definitive. However, it may be looked upon as an honest effort to bring together and verify the on-hand imprints for the years 1823 to 1826, inclusive.
