100 Dollars Reward. A SMALL BANK-BOOK, containing my account with the Bank of Baltimore, was lost or taken out of my pocket on Monday evening, the 6th instant, between Market-street bridge and Mr. Myer's tavern in Market-street, and the latter place; containing about eight hundred Dollars in Bank notes of different descriptions, among which are recollectored three notes of the Farmers' Bank of Maryland payable in Annapolis of one Hundred Dollars each, and one Twenty Dollar note of the Bank of Alexandria of the old impression, similar to the forty dollar notes—Of these, there is but few in circulation; also one note of hand drawn by Thomas Jones, endorsed by Passmore and Bare, which is crased with a pen and also endorsed with my name, amount one hundred and twenty-three dollars, and one do drawn by Joseph Kasin in my favor for sixty dollars, with a number of other papers, valuable only to me. The above reward will be given for the Book with the contents, as above described, or, if stolen, an additional reward will be given for apprehending the thief, so that he may be brought to justice. If any of the above described notes should be offered under suspicious circumstances, the stopping of them will confer an obligation on the subscriber for the recovery of which a proportional reward will be given. Information is requested to be lodged with the printer or John Trimble, 18 Cheap-side. EDMUND LYNCH. October 9 d4t

From the Philadelphia Daily Advertiser. We are indebted to a respectable friend for the following circumstantial account of the Massacre in St. Domingo, in May 1806. [Causes, &c.] The loss of the twelve who went off from Marchand, combined with the escape of the seven from the Cape, exasperated the Emperor to so violent a degree, that he instantaneously decreed the destruction of all the remaining whites. His orders reach Christophe, who retires to the Fort Ferrier, and singles out twelve or fifteen white who must be preserved. Some of these he has with him, and some remain in town, but under the immediate eye of the commandant of the place, who is directed to see that no injury is done them. Except very few, all the other whites are in the country, where as I have above stated, they were sent a short time before. These arrangements are all carried on so secretly, that not a word is known of the intentions or movements of the government, until Tuesday morning the 13th of May, when we learn with horror and concern that all the unfortunate whites, except those marked for preservation, were assassinated during the preceding night. As it was done out of the city, our ears were not assailed with the shrieks of the dying victims, nor were our gutters as in the preceding massacre, flowing with streams of human blood. The only trace of murder to be seen in the streets, was one spot of about half a gallon of blood. One unfortunate family however were butchered in the town, and as it will give some idea of the modes of murder pursued by the Haytiens, I will give the particulars. It was publicly communicated through the town on the following day, by the nurse of the family, a negro woman, who openly pointed out the individuals employed on the expedition. Mr. Selle was a baker, and a man of respectability. D. Salinas & Christophe had long expressed a great friendship for him, and after having saved him from a general massacre of 1804, appointed him baker of the army. His wife was a handsome genteel woman of about thirty-five, and they had three small children, the youngest of which was at the breast. Richard, commandant of the place with a guard of soldiers, went to the house about midnight and knocking at the door, called Mr. Selle to come down and let him in.—He said he had just received orders from the Emperor, to send out of the city all the house servants, and that he wanted theirs. Madame Selle upon hearing this, called out "I hope, commandant, you don't intend taking my nurse—I have a very young infant and rather than you should take its nurse you might take me." Richard insisted upon entering, and Mr. Selle was obliged to open the door. He entered at a certain signal, four black grenadiers rushed in, and throwing a rope with a noose, round Mr. Selle's neck, and one round his wife's, hauled upon the ends till they were both strangled. They then mashed the baby in their hands, and strangled the other two children who were asleep in bed. The chests were then broken open, and the money taken off by the commandant. After this barbarity, the wicked assassins instead of burying the bodies of this unfortunate family, to hide their guilt from the eyes of the world, dragged them to a ditch on the very edge of the town, about two hundred yards from their house, where they lay uncovered and exposed, till the dogs and the vultures had devoured them. So cruel the Americans went to see the horrid spectacle, and an Indigene of veracity one day assured me, that he saw a dog running through the street with one of Madame Selle's hands in his mouth. The Massacre in the Country was not executed as the former had been, by the troops solely. Christophe said that the soldiers had already waded deep enough in blood, and on that account allotted a great part of the labour, to the cultivators of the plantations, who on the occasion made use of their big knives, and butchered the men, women, and children, in perfect sang froid. On the afternoon succeeding this affair, a man by the name of Loi, a great artillery, and one intended to be preserved, was sent for by the general at the fort. His wife accompanied him, and at a short distance from the town, the soldiers took her aside from the road to kill her. Loi saw it, snatched a sabre from one of the soldiers and engaged them all. He laid two or three on the spot, but was finally killed, with his wife. Loi was a fine bold military looking man, and was one of the soldiers that crossed the bridge of Lodi with Bonaparte. His house in town being deserted, afforded a favourable opportunity for pillage, whereupon in the night, it was broken open and completely plundered, even to the very boards. The wine and rum found there (being a store) intoxicated the soldiers for the next day, and the little taste they had of common property, resolved them to lay a plan for a general pillage. The American saw the dangerous situation in which they were placed; for had it not been prevented by the government, they would have been the chief sufferers, and many of them would no doubt have perished. But the officers of government having heard of this intention, ordered out the militia of the city, and all the mutinous party of the soldiery were apprehended & put into prison. Had Christophe been in
